ASA advises leading analytics business for the second time

Specialist analytics engineering firm Thyson Technology has undergone a management buyout after securing investment from a private equity house.

The Cheshire-based company is a leading provider of complex analyser systems, project management and manpower services for process industries. It has received significant funding from a deal with NVM, a long-established private equity company based in the North of England.

Following the successful partnership between Adam Street Advisers (“ASA”) and the founders of Thyson Technology back in 2013, ASA was appointed to advise them on the sale of their remaining shareholding to NVM.

Andrew Barnsley, founder and managing partner at ASA, said: “We were thrilled for the opportunity to work with the founders of Thyson Technology for a second time.

“With our knowledge of the private equity landscape and track record in advising on private equity transactions, we are confident that we were able to assist in achieving the best terms of the transaction.”
